Angela Tait: COVID Clay Diary

2020
Wednesday 10.38am

I’m afraid...

Well, maybe not afraid, but disconcerted, unsettled, a little perturbed. The ground beneath my feet feels unstable, a bit like one of those fairground attractions I remember from my childhood with the sliding floors and wonky mirrors.

Yesterday the university I work for cancelled most of the face-to-face teaching due to the COVID-19 global pandemic. I walked out of the building with as much of my desk as I could fit in my rucksack; a laptop, some vital paperwork, a print I’d swapped with a colleague and as much of the library as I could carry. I abandoned my favourite mug, watered the plants and left, wondering if we’d be back in September complete with a cohort of shiny new undergraduates or if the whole place would be opened up in fifty years like a giant time capsule.

So now as I write, the financial markets are in freefall and social media is divided between predictions of the apocalypse, people wanting virtual validation of their integrity for checking on elderly neighbours and, satirical (dark, but amusing) memes. Fake news abounds and the capacity for human lunacy is astonishing. I’m trying to take the wide view with as much logical pragmatism as I can muster, applying a degree of criticality to everything I read. That said, I did panic buy three packets of biscuits yesterday in the supermarket, but who doesn’t need a Jammie Wagon Wheel in a time of crisis?

On the train on my way home I hatched a plan; I feel the need to document events as they unfold.

What if I keep a diary? Not the traditional written kind, but one made of objects – a cup(?) - every day for as long as necessary. The global context is larger than I can deal with. We could lose people we love; some already have. Jobs, businesses, livelihoods will inevitably be damaged and the effects of this level of disruption might rumble on for years. But what about the minutiae? How will we remember that? The actual lived experience of a global event plotted as it unravels. If nothing else it will give me something to focus on during what promises to be a challenging time.

I’m starting today. My new year’s resolutions have historically lasted on average three to four days, so I’m sceptical about my own ability to maintain momentum. Nevertheless, here goes…
Day 1
A List:
• Schools to close
• Ran outside
• Scaffolding on house
• No writing
• Worried about students

Day 2
The Pandictionary
• Social distancing
• Stimulus package
• Lockdown
• Panic buying

Day 3
Z is home, we made today’s pot together

Day 4
I planted seeds and someone gave me a cactus

Day 5
I find myself vacillating between infinite admiration of the human spirit and overwhelming frustration at the capacity of people to be pillocks
Day 6
Stay at home, protect the NHS, save lives

Day 7
LOCKDOWN

Day 8
Sunshine, reflecting the weather and my mood

Day 9
Last night the owls were really loud and the birds today are springtime frisky

Day 10
In a day with one piece of bad news after another, back-to-back meetings and tensions everywhere, I managed to peg out the washing and some of it actually dried

Day 11
Potters’ playtime has been postponed so Geoff challenged everyone to make a pot with 75 grams of clay

Day 12
We are allowed out once a day to exercise
I own a bike – who knew?
Day 13
I asked Z what cup I should make, he said the most boring cup in the world. I think he’s fed-up.

Day 14
We’re shopping for several other people. Some of the things we’re asked for are a bit random.

Day 15
Developing new work

Day 16
I made soup

Day 17
Family poker night

Day 18
I have been pondering the way my brain flits from ceramics to emails to cooking and meetings all in the same physical space.

Day 19
Reflecting upon how our relationship to food has changed.

More family eating together but also more snacking and drinking.
Day 20
Today I worked on assessments and gave blood. A+ is both my blood group and the highest grade we give.

Day 21
The last 24 hours have been lumpy with family wobbles.

Day 22
Sometimes my brain feels like this.

Day 23
The way we stay in touch is changing.

Day 24
Children throughout the country are making rainbows for their windows to be cheerful and support the NHS.

Day 25
There are huge bees in the garden and less cars on the road. The world is taking a breath.

Day 26
Easter Sunday
April 2020

Day 27
Threads of thinking, all overlapping

Day 28
Today, all I have done, all day, is type
Oh, and I put the bins out

Day 29
Today I have been grumpy

Day 30
This morning as I was sitting in bed answering work emails I realised how overlapped my domestic and public worlds have become

Day 31
The WiFi went down and had to be reset

Day 32
PPE is the centre of the news. There’s not enough — or perhaps there is but it’s all in the wrong place

Day 33
Practically all that is holding the world together
Day 34
It's my birthday. I'm usually really rubbish at birthdays but this one was quite nice.
Which house has no wrapping paper but a load of old flight maps?

Day 35
Oil is negatively priced for the first time ever. The oil companies are paying for it to be taken off their hands.

Day 36
Bottomless emails – Answer ten receive twelve more.

Day 37
Tutorials all day. I made my own head hurt with talking too loudly.

Day 38
I deconstructed my studio installation. Now I have a big pile of ribbon.

Day 39
813 COVID deaths in the last 24 hours.

Day 40
A family raku firing.
Day 41
I tried to take more breaks from work but this just resulted in walking backwards and forwards between the office and the washing line.

Day 42
The way we exercise has changed. I’m a 3 spin class a week kind of girl, but I’ve been running, cycling and walking for miles.

Day 43
I started to embroider another Sky dish.

Day 44
H replaced the thermocouples in the big kiln.

Day 45
I’ve been thinking about how my diary is mediated through the idea that it’s going to be public property.

Day 46
Batch cooking and three separate conversations about salt.

Day 47
IT and I got negative COVID tests. I exercised, I spent time pottering in the garden – the bluebells are out, I baked biscuits, I drank coffee, I walked.
Day 48
In praise of denim

Day 49
The new breakfast bar stools came. H screwed them together. One didn’t fit. He unscrewed it and then had to put it back together again because the company needed pictures of it not fitting.

Day 50
Nothing much happening.
It’s very VERY sunny

Day 51
I have been sewing a lot, and so have other people. The resurgence of craft is heartening

Day 52
A found sculpture on our walk

Day 53
Made a pot to match my hair

Day 54
Our domestic appliances work relentlessly in their endless quest to maintain us
Day 55
Stay alert, control the virus, save lives

Day 56
Endless typewriting

Day 57
The new normal

Day 58
Internal dialogues

Day 59
We’re trying to have take-out once a week to support local businesses

Day 60
We’re communicating in different ways

Day 61
Changes in the way we eat are reflected in a collaborative project I’m involved in
Day 62
My love/hate relationship with technology

Day 63
The airfield partially re-opened.

Day 64
We’re actively discouraged from using public transport for the first time I can remember. How will I get to work?

Day 65
Pollocks to that — reading student essays about painting

Day 66
A lumpy day

Day 67
Oh my goodness it’s windy

Day 68
The way we consume goods has changed
Day 69

The cracks are starting to show

Day 70

I’m trying a different way of working

Day 71

We had a lovely doggie visitor

Day 72

Today is the last clap for carers, a strange and controversial ritual which has developed over the lockdown

Day 73

I am frantically reading theory module essay submissions. I read a lovely one this morning about Rebecca Warren

Day 74

Made using the cabbage from the seeds I planted on day four. The garden is looking spectacular

Day 75

#BLM
Day 76

First day of the relaxing of lockdown restrictions. We are now allowed to mix with other families in our own gardens. I have been pondering charity shops, drinking coffee with friends and together/apartness

Day 77

It feels a little like the days are on 24 hour repeat

Day 78

I left some pots outside overnight, but it rained

Day 79

Public me and Private me

Day 80

We had visitors for an appropriately distanced barbeque. Six people in the same space

Day 81

I made H a cup of tea and took him two chocolate hobnobs. He said, 'Thanks Mam' like I'd just given him one of my kidneys

Day 82

77 COVID deaths
Time ticks by it always does,
It never wants to wait for us,
It always wants to race us there,
And then it’s gone, but why, and where?

(The Sloth’s Shoes, Jeanne Willis)

Even before we locked down, it was clear we were about to experience something life-altering. As I headed home on the 17th of March I already had a vague notion that I would make a diary, a cup every day to document my own experience and some of the wider social, political and cultural happenings of the pandemic.

As I write we’re on day 81. I’ve just opened my last bag of clay - I allocated 50 kilos of a creamy coloured, slightly speckled stoneware – and I plan to stop on the 15th June (day 90) when some children will be invited back to school and non-essential shops can start to reopen.

I have made dozens of vessels; some resemble cups, others are unrecognisable, like the one I ran over with my bike because the way we exercise has changed. Many are thrown on the potters’ wheel, others built from slabs with embossed detail. On day 48 I made the ‘ode to denim’ when I realised that I’d worn the same two pairs of shorts for two months straight. I rolled an old pair of jeans over the clay to leave a relief pattern complete with pocket detail and belt loops and then used the slab to construct a rudimentary vessel shape. The piece was finished with a wash of manganese to bring out the details. Others in the collection are part-glazed from a limited palette, and a rare few have some gold lustre detail or fired-on decals.

There is narrative, abstraction, metaphor and some subtle (and more blatant) art history references.

Since March 17th, time has been difficult to understand. Looking back, lockdown seems like somewhere between a heartbeat and an eternity. In one way we’ve lost a whole season. The summer is here, the baby birds have fledged and the blossom has gone, replaced by tiny fruits ready to swell. What happened to spring and those rituals we associate with it? Easter holidays, degree shows and the end of the university year. Viewed differently we’ve been at home forever. Our old routines have morphed into new rituals which have become so ingrained we are almost institutionalised by them. My time has narrowed. A 24 hour cycle is pretty much on repeat.

I see the same people, work in the same place and eat the same regular three meals (plus snacks). Looking back before lockdown is disconcerting. I struggle to feel nostalgia for hugging friends and traveling to work on the sweaty packed train, because we currently have no way to know when the old normal might return. But if looking back is awkward, projecting forward is virtually impossible. We don’t yet know if every child can go to school in September or when our next holiday might be. Will we be able to have Christmas dinner with our loved ones or will that be a facsimile this year mediated by a screen and an increasingly popular meetings app?

As the diary grows I start to reflect and the early entries seem like another world. Day two was called the ‘Pandictionary’ and considered the new language we were being introduced to; social distancing, panic buying and stimulus packages. Today it seems ludicrous that people were stockpiling toilet roll and pasta - it seemed bonkers at the time to me anyway.

Some of the pieces have new significance as time trundles along its narrow track. On the 18th of April, day 32, I made a gravy jug with its own tiny facemask. There simply wasn’t enough protective equipment for our caring staff in the hospitals and the care homes. Everyone blamed everyone else and the issue dominated the daily news conference for several days. Nearly 50 days later and I have made a couple of dozen masks from reclaimed fabric (my Mother’s old pastel coloured cotton capri pants mostly) and it has just been announced that masks will be compulsory on public transport. Artists have adopted the mask to make political or satirical comments and wearing in public is commonplace.

It seems even the concept of time through my diary is fluid. What should be a robust daily measure, like a clock or a calendar, is a flexible and ever moving beast within which meanings are not yet settled.

This will finish; humanity is resilient and some patches of the old normal will resume. For now the timing is uncertain and so I plod, one foot in front of the other through the days, mostly smiling, but on the inside trying to process the nonsense in a wibbly wobbly world where everything we know is like a ball of slime dripping through a sieve.
Day 83
Found objects from our walks

Day 84
I was approached by a local vicar, I barely know her. She asked me to make her a ceramic chalice. I bumbled something about speaking after lockdown and then kicked myself all afternoon. Today is about my inability to say no.

Day 85
The carpet man came

Day 86
Nothing much happened today

Day 87
Toasties are ace

Day 88
My bike has a puncture

Day 89
We’re all contemplating the new normal and wondering what happened to the old normal we liked.
June 2020
